Nobody can doubt, we think, that society is deeply moved in Clarksville at this time on the subject of strong drink; those who take an unfavorable view of the proposition. Under such circumstances the duty of a public journalwhether the excited condition of public feeling contains any elements which can be directed to the practical good of the public (and no widespread agitation is ever entirely destitute of such elements); he has to enforce and promote these, and, if it should appear to him that any error is mixed up with the better tendencies, it is his duty to point it out and to do what lies in him towards eliminating the error and rendering the beneficent tendencies efficient and permanent. On the general subject of temperance so much has been said here within the last two weeks as to furnish a good reason for our saying nothing, and we propose to say nothing on that head. Our purpose is to dwell on some topics specially affecting this community, with regard to which we have information not accessible to the excellent temperance advocate we have had among us, and these are the special causes which promote intemperance in this city and the special remedies which we deem applicable to their. We are nothing if not historical, and can best get at our subject by some observations on the progress of intemperance in Clarksville in the last

At that time drinking prevailed in great excess; the number of drinking saloons was portentous, and every other line of business was depressed almost to annihilation; public feeling was in a state of feverish excitement; our young soldiers had returned home after a four years' exposure to specially demoralizing influences in the army; schools and colleges had been crushed out of existence; the very churches had been paralyzed by the crushing pressure of war and defeat; our young men and boys were under no guidance, temptations and inducements to intemperance were wide open all round them, and, what was more serious than anything, they had nothing else to do.

It is needless to say what came of all this. Like causes produce like effects the world over, and intemperance took an alarming hold of this good city, as indeed it did of the whole nation, but it is of Clarksville that we have mainly to speak. Drinking was universal throughout all ages and all grades in life. This did not go on long, however, without vigorous efforts at amelioration. The churches first shook off their lethargy and girded themselves for clations of it, call in the police and their holy work, the regeneration of society, and then slowly and against great difficulties our schools and colleges were reorganized. Let us pause here to recall what these chief nized and licensed by the law, and difficulties were. We had no money; that was one, but it was not the main obstacle. The almost insuperable impediment was the condition part of the work appropriately fallof what ought to have constituted the school population. The soldier boys who were still young enough Will they make an effort to secure for education had had their school their younger brothers from the course interrupted at its most critical period, and while they were in the instances too strong for them? If army had acquired habits and modes they don't do it, we see no likeliof thought very adverse to sound hood of anyone else undertaking it, school training, and those who were too young to be in the army were just growing up wild. There had searcely been an attempt to educate them; their parents had been in a thoroughly unsettled condition; ev- a year or two. erything was unsettled and no one had any time to attend to them and they grew up rather like weeds than like cultured plants. We have dwelt on this state of things not only to show the difficulties of establishing schools at the time, but to point out how peculiarly open and defenseless youths so circumstanced were towards incentives to dissipation. In spite of all difficulties, however, and all discouragement the influences for good contended against the tendencies to evil with some success. The schools and colleges and churches gradually got under way
